

AN INTEGRATIVE PERSPECTIVE – INTERDISCIPLINARITY IN SOCIOLOGY. SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY – AN APPLIED SCIENCE

Ada DOBRESCU¹

Abstract: Sociology has been for ever a domain where interdisciplinary studies are present. There are subject matters like anthropology that was possible to explore with the amount and contribution of ethnology, ethnography, geography and psychology. Also a global and integral view has social psychology where border sciences like psychology, anthropology and sociology are met to born a new one. There are past ore present interactions, real or imaginary ones of the human's conduct in social contexts and the results are possible because of the communication of this scientific fields (exemples like social representations, collective behaviour, personality a "social self"). We can mention for interdisciplinarity contexts also urban sociology, rural sociology, industrial sociology, human resources, health sociology, sport sociology that are mixed combination of studies, methods, researches, instruments.

I want to mention that there is a obvious delimitation between pluridisciplinarity (information from a certain science are borrowed for the other); transdisciplinarity (a new perspective, interconnection of dsiciplines for creating a new one where we must train specialists – example biochemistry); multidisciplinarity(to replace side by side certain elements of multiple disciplines for reevaluating commons structures, or seeing the same problems but of different point of views – example: perceptions implies biochemistry, physiology, sociology, philosophy), interdisciplinarity (integration of different spheres of social field or reality by elaborating some new methodologies wich can be applied in different areas of scientific actions).

It's the most favourable fact that interactions in some specific domains like sociology produce new abilities, values, informations for a global examination of social contexts.

Key words: interdisciplinarity, transdisciplinarity, social psychology
